Predictive Services Discussion:

A strong storm will move through the West through this weekend, with breezy and dry conditions across the Desert Southwest. Heavy precipitation will affect northern and central California, with heavy snow and blizzard conditions in the Sierra, while moderate precipitation spreads across the northern two-thirds of the West. A series of weaker storms will bring periods of light to moderate precipitation to the northern half of the West next week, while the southern half of the West is breezy and dry. Breezy and dry westerly winds will affect the central and southern Plains to the Mid-Mississippi Valley this weekend, with the strongest winds Sunday and widespread elevated to critical conditions. Winds will continue across the Trans Pecos and Big Bend Monday. Dry and windy conditions are likely to return late next week for the southern High Plains. Two strong storms will bring moderate to heavy rain to much of the Southeast into the Mid-Atlantic and Northeast, the first today and tomorrow with another mid to late next week. Lighter precipitation is forecast for the northern Plains into the Great Lakes early next week, but much of the central and southern Plains is forecast to remain dry through mid-next week. Cold and generally dry conditions will continue for Alaska, while Hawai'i experiences moderate to strong trade winds and numerous showers for windward areas, with a few showers moving into leeward areas, especially early next week.
